Personal Perspectives.....

People are at the heart of care technology interventions but.....

- The population is more & more heterogeneous as it ages....but independence is an understandable fundamental need.
- Uncovering individual needs takes skill, time & effort....
- We aren't an easily defined "consumer group"

Individual insights, personalisation and choice are the key to really matching "what needed" with "what's possible". Good to see the White Paper speaking to this.

Processes can easily be siloed & collaboration is difficult.....

- A complex eco-system for care (and, of course, for health)....
- Across the board, from the user/client/consumer through commissioners to suppliers....and busy-ness gets in the way.
- Convening for success isn't easy. A single platform for collaboration doesn't exist. There isn't a framework for action
- But I'm optimistic. There are some wonderful collaborative "people-centric" initiatives. Sharing & replicating this best practice is vital....

Simple Principles can be part of every conversation about technology & care

- We don't need to wait for big policy to drive this.
- There's an opportunity to better consider & apply technology for care by listening to people and leading at the working level.
- These principles can be tested and improved....and a working framework developed. I'm enrolling you in this !
- So, what are the TAPPI Principles ?.....
